With the introduction of the new Undo/Redo tools, Lightroom has lost one of its most unique features to date. That “Undo what I just did” has long been a requested feature. And, for most people, it should never need to be said more than once. It is still very easy to accomplish that now. Lightroom is still a viable tool for those with no Disc, CD or thumb drive, however. There’s still the option of simply copying images from one catalog to another, although it does take a few extra steps. The Internet is rife with unverified reports claiming that some features in Lightroom are a little bit extorted from Photoshop. That’s simply not true, in my opinion, and likely also not true. However, several of the new features in Lightroom are inspired by or even modeled after those in Photoshop. For instance, the Album Picker can now be used to sort images according to the date they were shot. Thus, months or years can now be sorted onto a list. This applies to the Second Screen and Library tabs, which have produced a lot of interest on the Internet. It should be noted that all shots from the same day have been sorted into one folder. The Library can now hold over 2,000 images. The Album Picker works just like it did in earlier versions and saves the sorting by date in the default sorting order. Apart from the tools mentioned above, the improvement here is largely in the user interface and the improved sorting features. There are numerous other tweaks that improve the workflow and make the new user interface more stable. However, not all the new features were necessary. Among them are the performance issues that I mentioned earlier. I would have liked to have seen the new features that don’t work as well integrated. That’s not to say I don’t like the new features, but I would have liked the less substantial stuff (like the new layer styles) to have been adapted more to the workflow in Lightroom.

Adobe is committed to delivering a roadmap of key priorities for the roadmap year 2021. Updates so far will be incremental (in 2020) with on-going improvements in Creative Cloud app features, performance improvements, and other quality enhancements that will build excitement for more features. The next update for the Adobe Camera Raw (ACR) software is coming in a few weeks. This work is focused on the new API, which is now accessing the native platforms in a more conventional way. With this change, we are also removing older APIs that are based on reflection through the package installer. This includes the Camera Raw plug-in package, as well as support for older file formats, such as PSD, TIFF, TIFF with the new Exif profile, and more. In pursuit of a more stable native implementation of Adobe technology, we are also focusing on performance enhancements. The next release of Photoshop will include performance improvements in both the native app and the web application. In web apps, for example, users will see increased performance during editing operations, thanks to changes in JavaScript and the underlying technology. In the native app, this includes significantly improved performance helping users tackle more complex projects quickly. The update will be released in April 2020, and will include key new features such as the one-click Adjustment Panel tool made possible by new native APIs, significant performance enhancements, and other quality improvements. The April 2020 release also involves the removal of the legacy CC 2020 update. As we continue to iterate on the new API and platform approach outlined here, we will return to opportunities to roll this up other of the feature frameworks ultimately released. However, we will not be adding any features here as part of the 2020 release.
